LISTERS' CORNER C. Eric Tull

This issue reports birders' year-lists and day-lists. These seem to be the most popular time-based listing units, and the ones I will concentrate on in this column (unless I get some strong push for big minutes or big decades or some other such list). Year-lists are reported for Canada, the provinces, ATPAT, and a few recent local lists. Day-lists are reported for the provinces and ATPAT. The thresholds that I have used for year-lists are 10% less than those I used for the provincial life lists in the previous issue, and those for day-lists are another 10% lower. The list totals are taken from the Bird Commander Inc. program, whose creator, Tony White, is constantly updating the provincial list totals.

Shown in the lists are birders' best ever lists for each category that they have submitted to me. I have also shown the current top listers in each category, so birders may appear more than once in a category if their best lists are greater than their current lists. Current lists are shown in bold. I have marked both 1989 and 1990 records as being current, because there was no year/day-list report last year in Canadian Birding.

The number of birders who submit year-lists or day-lists is low relative to the number who submit life lists and/or day-lists. The lists include 123 provincial or territorial year-lists and only 42 provincial or territorial day-lists. I know there are birders out there with better year or day-lists than some of the leaders listed here, particularly where I have low lists leading some categories. Send me your lists please! Ontario was the most popular area for both year-lists and day-lists, having twice as many in both categories as the next most popular area.

It is interesting to compare the top year-lists as percentages with the top life lists as reported in the previous issue. In five cases (Canada, BC, AB, MB, and NS) the top year-lists are 10-14% lower than the top life lists. Is this a rough limit to how close a maximum effort year-list can approach a long-term life list? The difference is probably greater in provinces where good numbers of rarities have been sighted -- life lists can keep increasing while year-lists may hit a plateau. This may be the case in Ontario and Newfoundland. On the other hand I know that the 33% difference in NB represents a low year-list, which could easily be exceeded with a determined effort. In two cases (PEI and NWT) the top year-list is comparable to the top life list. I suspect bigger differences would soon appear if these areas were to have some longer-term resident birders.

Robert Parsons is the only birder to have broken 80% for a year-list. Six of the provinces and Canada have birders breaking the 70% threshold. Only Peter Hamel and Gerry Bennett have broken 400 for Canada, and only in Ontario and British Columbia have birders broken 300 for a provincial year-list. Mike Force's 340 in BC is the top for any provincial year-list. Competition is closest in Ontario where the three top listers are within two birds of each other. Six birders have broken 60% in two provinces -- Jo Ann and Hue MacKenzie (BC,ON), Peter Hamel (BC,MB), Angus MacLean (MB,PE), Blake Maybank (ON,NF), and Roger Burrows (PE,NF). Did Roger do so without setting foot on the mainland of Canada?

Not unexpectedly, day-lists are much lower, with most top day-lists being 45% or more lower than the top life lists. The exceptions are PEI and the Yukon, for which the above comment about long-term resident birders may be made, and Manitoba. Manitoba is clearly the mother lode of Canadian big-day birding. The routes and techniques have been practiced, polished, and perfected. In no other province has a threshold of 40% been broken, whereas Rudolf Koes and Gordon Grieef have seen a remarkable 55% of Manitoba's birds in a single day! Rudolf's 205 species in a day is 28 more than the top in the next highest province (BC). Furthermore, although their total has been exceeded by big days in the US, their percentage of the provincial (or state) list has not, to my knowledge, been approached.

Among the active current birders (i.e., for 1989 and 1990), only Muriel Carlson in Saskatchewan set a provincial high for year-lists. The highest current provincial year-list, and second highest overall, was the 327 of Danny Tyson in BC in 1989. Wayne Weber in BC, and John Olmsted and Gerry Bennett in Ontario broke the 300 mark, while Danny, Muriel and Robert Parsons in Manitoba had the only current year-lists over 70%. Three current birders have big-day-lists over 150 -- Blake Maybank with 156 (42%) in Manitoba, Drew Campbell with 156 (35%) in Ontario, and Wayne Weber with 153 (34%) in BC.

On a personal note I am moving again, hopefully this time for a long stay. Lists should be sent to me at 415 Thornhill Place NW, Calgary, AB, T2K 2S6.
